Museum of the City of New York Celebrates Robert Rauschenberg's Centennial with Landmark Exhibition

Robert Rauschenberg's New York: Pictures from the Real World explores the artist's groundbreaking use of photography in depictions of urban life

(New York, NY) - In celebration of the centennial of Robert Rauschenberg (1925–2008), and in partnership with the Robert Rauschenberg Foundation, the Museum of the City of New York (MCNY) proudly announces Robert Rauschenberg's New York: Pictures from the Real World, a major exhibition opening on September 12, 2025. This dynamic show explores Rauschenberg's innovative integration of photography and found objects into his art, reflecting his deep engagement with “the real world” and his complex relationship with New York City.

Widely regarded as one of the most influential artists of postwar New York, Rauschenberg's irreverent approach to art-making pushed the envelope for an entire generation, reshaping the art world in New York and around the world. At the heart of his practice was a desire to incorporate the tangible world around him into his art. Gathering materials and inspiration from his surroundings, he often brought found objects and images sourced or reproduced from magazines and newspapers into his paintings and sculptures. But Rauschenberg was not merely a user of found imagery; he was also a photographer with a bold creative vision—an essential aspect of his artistic practice that is the focus of the exhibition.

The show is organized into three sections—Early Photographs, In + Out City Limits, and Photography in Painting—tracing the evolution of Rauschenberg's photographic practice and its interplay with painting, sculpture, and assemblage. His earliest images are largely intimate portraits and experiments with formal elements such as framing, light and shadow, and flattening the picture plane.

The centerpiece of the exhibition is In + Out City Limits, a three-year (1979–81) photographic survey conducted across the United States—a project Rauschenberg had originally conceived decades earlier as a student at Black Mountain College in North Carolina. His New York photographs from this project reveal his fascination with the signs and symbols of human culture, even in the most humble or discarded remnants of the city. Together, these photographs emphasize his observational rigor and his constant effort to channel the fleeting, ineffable moments of life into his work—revealing a deep sensitivity to the social landscape.

In addition, the exhibition presents a selection of works created between 1963 and 1994 that combine Rauschenberg's New York City photographs with images taken around the world, illustrating how he recontextualized his photographic imagery through his innovative creative process.

"By incorporating photographs and everyday objects into his artworks, Robert Rauschenberg placed the realities of life at the center of his art, blurring traditionally held boundaries between the two and compelling us to look more closely at the world around us," said Sean Corcoran, Senior Curator of Prints and Photographs at MCNY. "Our exhibition will highlight Rauschenberg's enduring relevance, as his work continues to resonate in an increasingly image-saturated world."

The exhibition is accompanied by a richly illustrated companion book, co-published by MCNY and Giles Ltd, featuring contributions from Sean Corcoran and Helen Hsu, Associate Curator for Research, Robert Rauschenberg Foundation.

"The Museum of the City of New York is thrilled to honor Robert Rauschenberg's centennial," added Stephanie Hill Wilchfort, Ronay Menschel Director and President of MCNY. "This exhibition not only underscores Rauschenberg's profound impact on the art world but also celebrates his deep connection to New York City, which shaped much of his creative journey. We are grateful to the Robert Rauschenberg Foundation for its partnership and support, which makes this exploration of his transformative work possible."

Courtney J. Martin, Executive Director of the Robert Rauschenberg Foundation, remarked, "We are honored to support the Museum of the City of New York's thoughtful and timely exhibition. New York was not only a backdrop for Rauschenberg's practice, it was also a catalyst for the ways that his objects would take shape for the entirety of his career. This exhibition reminds us how the city's energy, texture, and unpredictability were central to his groundbreaking approach to artmaking."
